'What are the wild waves saying
As they cast up the wrack in a tangle?
I hear in the music of their spraying,
That ABC is a triangle.

What are the words of those 'freshmen'
As they cross the college quadrangle?
'O how did you answer that question
On ABC is a triangle?'

High wranglers may rise to great fame
With their mathematical wrangle
But they will never cease to proclaim
That ABC is a triangle.

**An unusually elegant production, distilling the results of tens of thousands of tests, started in 1914 and continued to the date of publication. The intention was to investigate the true working of circuit breakers under various conditions - '...the instruments used were a camera, a voltmeter, an ammeter and a foot rule...', and considering the simplicity of the apparatus, the photographic results are striking. Anderson gives few facts about his photographic methods, mentioning that he used a stereocamera with a revolving shutter and a cine-camera. He states that he had been asked to consider a synchronous device to select the part of the wave at which the current was broken. He replied that '...the writer has absolutely no faith in these devices unless the switch to be opened is connected to the synchronous motor in the most direct and positive manner.' In this connection it is of interest that Harold Edgerton in the United States had begun to use a stroboscope and electronic flash for high speed photography in 1931, first publishing his results in 1939.*

*FREEMAN #2169 - Freeman dates the first appearance of this as 1860, being the third edition of BOSANQUET's 1854/1855 [FREEMAN #409] work of the same title, the beginning of the Victorian fern craze. As the Advertisement makes clear, only the title and plates of the original have been retained, the text being entirely new. Bosanquet's 1854 edition was unillustrated, the plates by Jobbins being added to the next edition of 1855. Following the appearance of the 1860 edition by Mrs. Lankester, there were numerous reprints and later editions - this above is such a reprint, the advertisements listing the then current Hardwicke's Science Gossip for 1868. Its success clearly justified Hardwick in issuing this revamped version of Bosanquet, which he described as '....somewhat too methodic and uninviting... a more popular edition would be acceptable.'

 Contemporary half morocco, backstrip split along one side, tip of lower corner of second title torn away, else a good copy. £60/ £30
- *The second work has blank interleaves, the first few of which have notes in German. In this pre-Freudian psychology, the content of dreams are seen as determined by previous experiences and as arising in what Ludwig Strumpell referred to as "almost memory-less isolation" from those experiences. Dreams were perceived as bizarre and chaotic, driven, as Freud described the theories of Wilhelm Wundt, by "internal... excitations of the sensory organs." The views of this pre-Freudian scientific community were remarkably similar to those held by neurobiologists and cognitive neuroscientists today.*
